From the White House to Main Street: Realities of Immigration Enforcement in the Current Era

Shakeel Syed is the executive director of OCCORD (Orange County Communities Organized for Responsible Development). OCCORD’s mission is to bring workers, families and community partners together to organize and advocate for good jobs, strong neighborhoods and an inclusive democracy in Orange County. He also serves the boards of ACLU and Death Penalty Focus. An imam, he is the former Executive Director of the Shura Council of Southern California.

Jennifer Lee Koh is a Professor of Law and Director of the Immigration Clinic at Western State College of Law. Her scholarship focuses on federal immigration enforcement and the intersection of criminal and immigration laws, and has been cited by the United States Supreme Court. Before moving to Orange County, Professor Koh taught in the Immigrants’ Rights Clinic at Stanford Law School as a Clinical Lecturer and Cooley Godward Kronish Fellow. Earlier in her career, she also clerked for the late Honorable Eugene Nickerson in the Eastern District of New York, was the director of a community lawyering project at the New York City-based domestic violence nonprofit Sanctuary for Families, and an associate in the litigation department of the law firm WilmerHale. Professor Koh received her J.D. from Columbia Law School and her B.A. from Yale University.
