

ANNOUNCING A NEW SERIES:

Demography and Politics in the Middle East & North Africa

Series Editors: Elhum Haghighat & Valeria Cetorelli

Until very recently, the Middle East and North Africa region was home to one of the highest population growth rates in the world. Demographic shifts have had profound implications on economic, political, and social spheres. As the region also experiences a period of unprecedented political turbulence, an understanding of these implications will be critical to the success of social scientists and policy makers attempting to analyze both the causes and the effects of political and social developments.

This interdisciplinary book series invites social science scholarship that explores the links and relationships between demographic change and social and political transformations in the region. In so doing, it aims to place recent political and demographic changes within their social, cultural, economic, and historical contexts and to further our understanding of the complex relationships between demography, politics, and society. The series editor and advisory board members invite timely scholarship on a range of topics, including, but not limited to: migration patterns and migrant communities, fertility patterns, marriage patterns, politics of gender and sexuality, labor force participation, educational patterns, urbanization and urbanism, social and public policy, and globalization and development.
