WOSU Public Media MATCH DAY

WOSU Public Media has a very special opportunity this month to help you maximize your donation. It’s WOSU Public Media Match Day.

Beginning February 8 and for 24-straight hours, every gift to WOSU Public Media will be matched by generous donors who have contributed to our Match Day fund. It’s easy to be part of Match Day! You can donate online, by phone or through social media. Listen all-day on 89.7 NPR News, Classical 101, or follow us online for updates on Match Day.

I hope you can join me for our Match Day special Thursday, February 9 at 7:30pm on WOSU TV as we end our annual Match Day celebration.

Your Match Day support creates the stable foundation of giving our community demonstrates every day. Mark your calendar and make your donation during this special time.

Lessons Learned from Coverage of the Attack at Ohio State University

Mike Thompson, Chief Content Director, News and Public Affairs

At 10am Monday, November 28th the text arrived – “OSU Safety Alert - Active shooter on campus, shelter in place.” Immediately, the 89.7 NPR News team focused on the story.

Our first decision was whether to go to continuous live coverage. Not knowing if it were an isolated incident, we first interrupted regular 89.7 programming with frequent updates. Once we confirmed multiple injuries from a random attack, we went to continuous coverage.

Ann Fisher and I relayed the latest information, went live to our reporters and interviewed witnesses. We aired the OSU Police news conference live. Editors continuously updated wosu.org and social media feeds and provided Facebook Live video.

The challenge with continuous live coverage of a breaking news event is we know some of what we report will end up being inaccurate, but we must be on the air to let people know something extremely important is happening. The difficult balance requires cautious reporting and frequent reminders of what is confirmed and unconfirmed.

Our basic rule was – report what we know. We told reporters and editors to monitor social media, but do not report anything we had not confirmed. When interviewing witnesses, we clarified exactly what they saw from what they heard from others. For the most part, what we reported on the air and online was accurate, and when the facts changed we quickly reported them. For example, we explained the attacker did not have a gun but a knife, and the shots witnesses heard came from an OSU police officer.

Thankfully all of the victims recovered and life at OSU returned to normal. Should a similar event occur again, WOSU listeners and digital users can rely on us to provide breaking news coverage in the same thoughtful manner.
Classical 101
February Highlights

Since there’s not really much classical music written for Groundhog Day, February has one really juicy holiday for special music programming...Valentine’s Day. Tune in on February 14th for some of your favorite romantic works, including Tchaikovsky’s Romeo and Juliet, Khatchaturian’s Adagio of Spartacus and Phrygia, and who knows what other heartfelt musical declarations.

February is also Black History Month, so we’ll be shining a special spotlight on great African-American composers and performers all month.

Concerts at Ohio State returned last month, and in February Christopher Purdy will feature performances from the OSU Wind Symphony, the Women’s Glee Club, the Ignis Saxophone Quartet and the OSU Symphony Orchestra. On February 26th, the program will feature the OSU Symphonic Choir performing Renaissance love songs by Monteverdi, Gesualdo, Lasso, and Greaves.

In February, the Met will be rolling out a new production of Dvorak’s magical opera Rusalka, and you can hear it Saturday, February 25th in a matinee broadcast featuring Kristine Opolais. Opolais is a new favorite at the Met, and this role is one that helped launch her international career. Rusalka’s haunting “Song to the Moon” is the popular aria in this fairytale of love, longing, rejection and redemption.
